Introduction

The kind of information presented about a person in this document are (when it's known) dates and place of birth, baptism, wedding, death and burial.

I've only gathered data about ancestors, trying to get some generations back in time. It would be too big a task to include extensive information about an ancestor's siblings and their descendants. The only information about siblings included are the date of birth or baptism, and if a person is known to have emigrated to America.

The practice of given- and surnames in pre-1900 Norway was quite different from today. Family names like the ones we use nowadays were almost non-existent in rural Norway.

A persons name consisted of three parts:

- 1) A Christian name (like today).
- 2) A patronymic (fathers-) name, always ending with -sen/-son for men, or -datter (-dtr.) for women.
- 3) A surname, which in reality was an address. The surname changed as the person moved from farm to farm.

For instance: "Kristian Albert Johnsen Jørstad" really means: "Kristian Albert, son of John, living at the Jørstad farm". This system is still in use in Iceland.

Orthography was unknown to the priests and other writers of registers in the old days. It seems that they pretty much wrote what they thought they heard. As a result, the name of a person or a farm could be written in several different ways. For instance, the farm "Laugsand" is also written Loesand, Lougsand, Lovsang and Langsand in the censuses and parish registers.

The numbering system used in this document is called "Kekule von Stradonitz' system".

This means that the ancestors are numbered consecutively. The proband (the starting point) is person no.1. The father is no.2, the mother is no.3, the father's father no.4, the father's mother no.5, the mother's father no.6, the mother's mother no.7 and so on. Consequently all men are numbered with an even number and women with an odd number. You can always find a person's father by multiplying the person's number with two, and the mother by multiplying with two and adding one (e.g. the parents of no.7 is no.14 and 15). Likewise you can find a man's child by divide his number by two, and a woman's child by subtract one from her number and divide by two (e.g. the child of no.18 and 19 is no.9). Only the persons that are ancestors of the proband are given their own number, their siblings are not.

From where does the information originate?

Most of the info is gathered from the Internet. The main sources are:

Digitalarkivet (<http://arkivverket.no/Digitalarkivet>): Censuses from about 1660 to 1900.

Arkivverket (http://www.arkivverket.no/URN:kb_read): Scanned parish registers from about 1650 till about 1930.

Family search (<http://www.familysearch.org>): The Mormon-database in Salt Lake City, Utah.

Discussion forums (e.g. <http://www.disnorge.no/slektsforum/>): One can usually get good help from other people.

Private databases on the www: Lots of Norwegian genealogists have published their databases on the web.

Google: Great help when you're searching for farms and surnames.

Not on the Internet:

Bygdebøker: Local history books. Most rural communities in Norway has at least one, usually several.
